The N2 in schizophrenia-proneness: roles of executive functions, trait negative affectivity, and gender. Schizophrenia proneness is a cognitive personality trait related to frontal, thalamo-limbic, and subcortical regions. The most widely supported hypothesis that schizophrenia is a disorder of information processing and integration posits a role for N2 in schizophrenia proneness. The present study investigated N2 in relation to the cognitive dimensions of anhedonia, disorganization, and negative emotionality and the individual differences in trait negative affectivity. Healthy volunteers completed an emotional Stroop task, which simultaneously recorded event-related potential and behavioral responses. Electrophysiologically, N2 was measured as an index of target detection and discrimination accuracy. Participants were also administered self-report measures of trait negative affectivity, anhedonia, and disorganization. N2 was associated with trait negative affectivity, but not with disorganization or anhedonia. Gender differences in trait negative affectivity, but not in disorganization or anhedonia, were observed. The finding that N2 is related to trait negative affectivity and gender but not to disorganization or anhedonia suggests the possibility that processes underlying N2 are involved in schizophrenia proneness and that distinct developmental mechanisms may be responsible for proneness to schizophrenia. These results also underscore the importance of considering individual differences in trait negative affectivity when investigating schizophrenia-proneness.
